the hand and the muscles influencing it, and is well developed in forms in which the median is undeveloped. The muscles of the forearm, to which the ulnar nerve goes—the Flexor Carpi Ulnaris, and the ulnar portion of the Flexor Profundus Digitorum—are among the most interesting muscles in the limb. Both muscles are singularly constant. They are the most effective muscles in the backward movement of the manus in swimming and in walking, and in the case of the Flexor Carpi Ulnaris, in making tense that portion of the wing membrane of the bat lying between the manus and the side of the body. The course of some of the cutaneous nerves of the manus in the bat is indicated by raised folds of the integument, which, when present, have systemic significance.
